Gāthina, Gādhya, and Jāhnavā; he was at first a functionary, together with Vasishṭha, of Su-dās, king of the Tṛitās; seeing V<sup>o</sup> preferred by the king, he went over to the Bharatas, but could not prevent their being defeated by Su-dās, although he caused the waters of the rivers Vipā and Sūtudri to retire and so give the Bharatas free passage, RV. iii, 33; he was born as a Kshatriya, deriving his lineage from an ancestor of Kuṭika, named Purū-ravas, of the lunar race of kings, and himself sovereign of Kanyā-kubja or Kanoj; his fame rests chiefly on his contests with the great Brāhmaṇa Vasishṭha, and his success in elevating himself, though a Kshatriya, to the rank of a Brāhmaṇa, see Manu vii, 42: the Rāmāyana, which makes him a companion and counsellor of the young Rāma-candra, records [i, 51-65] how Viśvāmitra, on his accession to the throne, visited Vasishṭha's hermitage, and seeing there the cow of plenty [probably typical of go, 'the earth'], offered him untold treasures in exchange for it, but being refused, prepared to take it by force; a long contest ensued between the king and the saint [symbolical of the struggles between the Kshatriya and Brāhmaṇical classes], which ended in the defeat of Viṣvāmītra, whose vexation was such that, in order to become a Brahman and thus conquer his rival, he devoted himself to intense austerities [during which he was seduced by the nymph Menakā and had by her a daughter, Śakuntalā], gradually increasing the rigour of his mortification through thousands of years, till he successively earned the titles of Rājārshi, Rishi, Maharshi, and finally Brahmarshi; he is supposed to be the author of nearly the whole of RV. iii, and of ix, 67, 13-15; x, 137, 5; 167; moreover, a law-book, a Dhanurveda, and a medical wk. are attributed to him), RV. &c. &c.; a partic. विष्णु *viṣṇu (dat. viṣṇāya = viṣṇave), Pañcar. (wrong form used by uneducated persons).

विष्णापु *viṣṇāpū, m. N. of a son of Viśvaka, RV.

विष्णु *viṣṇu, m. (prob. fr. √viṣh, 'All-pervader' or 'Worker') N. of one of the principal Hindu deities (in the later mythology regarded as 'the preserver,' and with Brahmā 'the creator' and Śiva 'the destroyer,' constituting the well-known Tri-mūrti or triad; although Viṣṇu comes second in the triad he is identified with the supreme deity by his worshippers; in the Vedic period, however, he is not placed in the foremost rank, although he is frequently invoked with other gods [esp. with Indra, whom he assists in killing Vṛitra and with whom he drinks the Soma juice]; cf. his later names Indrānuja and Upeṇḍra); as distinguished from the other Vedic deities, he is a personification of the light and of the sun, esp. in his striding over the heavens, which he is said to do in three paces [see tri-vikrama and cf. balī, vāmana], explained as denoting the threefold manifestations of light in the form of fire, lightning, and the sun, or as designating the three daily stations of the sun in his rising, culminating, and setting; Viṣṇu does not appear to have been included at first among the Ādityas [q.v.], although in later times he is accorded the foremost place among them; in the Brāhmaṇas he is identified with sacrifice, and in one described as a dwarf; in the Mahā-bhārata and Rāmāyaṇa he rises to the supremacy which in some places he now enjoys as the most popular deity of modern Hindu worship; the great rivalry between him and Śiva [cf. Vaiṣṇava and Śaiva] is not fully developed till the period of the Purāṇas: the distinguishing feature in the character of the Post-vedic Viṣṇu is his condescending to become incarnate in a portion of his essence on ten principal occasions, to deliver mankind from certain great dangers [cf. avatāra and IW. 327]; some of the Purāṇas make 22 incarnations, or even 24, instead of 10; the Vaiṣṇavas regard Viṣṇu as the supreme being, and often identify him with Nārāyaṇa, the personified Puruṣa or primeval living spirit [described as moving on the waters, reclining on Śeṣha, the serpent of infinity, while the god Brahmā emerges from a lotus growing from his navel; cf. Manu i, 10]; the wives of Viṣṇu are Aditi and Sinivālī, later Lakshmi or Śrī and even Sarasvatī; his son is Kāma-deva, god of love, and his paradise is called Vaikuṇṭha; he is usually represented with a peculiar mark on his breast called śrī-vatsa, and as holding a śankha or conch-shell called Pāñcājanya, a cakra or quoit-like missile-weapon called Sudarśana, a gada or club called Kaumodak, and a padma or lotus; he has also a bow called Śārṅga, and a sword called Nandaka; his vāhana or vehicle is Garuda, q.v.; he has a jewel on his wrist called Syamantaka, another on his breast called Kaustubha, and the river Ganges is said to issue from his foot; the demons slain by him in his character of 'preserver from evil,' or by Kṛiṣṇa as identified with him, are Madhu, Dhenuka, Cāpūra, Yama, and Arjuna [see yamalarjuna]; Kāla-nemi, Haya-grīva, Śakaṭa, Ariṣṭa, Kaitābha, Kaṣa, Keśin, Mura, Śālya, Māinda, Dvi-vida, Rāhu, Hiranya-kaśipu, Bāṇa, Kāliya, Naraka, Bali; he is worshipped under a thousand names, which are all enumerated in MBh. xiii, 6956-7056; he is sometimes regarded as the divinity of the lunar mansion called Śravaṇa, RV. &c. &c. वेद 1. veda, m. (fr. √1. vid, q. v.) knowledge, true or sacred knowledge or lore, knowledge of ritual, RV.; AltBr.; N. of certain celebrated works which constitute the basis of the first period of the Hindī religion (these works were primarily three, viz. 1. the Rig-veda, 2. the Yajur-veda [of which there are, however, two divisions, see taittirīya-saṃhitā, vājasaneyi-saṃhitā], 3. the Sāma-veda; these three works are sometimes called collectively trayī, 'the triple Vidyā' or 'threefold knowledge', but the Rig-veda is really the only original work of the three, and much the most ancient [the oldest of its hymns being assigned by some who rely on certain astronomical calculations to a period between 4000 and 2500 B.C., before the settlement of the Āryans in India; and by others who adopt a different reckoning to a period between 1400 and 1000 B.C., when the Āryans had settled down in the Panjāb]; subsequently a fourth Veda was added, called the Atharva-veda, which was probably not completely accepted till after Manu, as his law-book often speaks of the three Vedas—calling them trayam brahma sanātānam, 'the triple eternal Veda', but only once [xi, 33] mentions the revelation made to Atharvan and Aṅgiras, without, however, calling it by the later name of Atharva-veda; each of the four Vedas has two distinct parts, viz. 1. Mantra, i.e. words of prayer and adoration often addressed either to fire or to some form of the sun or to some form of the air, sky, wind &c., and praying for health, wealth, long life, cattle, offspring, victory, and even forgiveness of sins, and 2. Brāhmaṇa, consisting of Vidhi and Artha-vāda, i.e. directions for the detail of the ceremonies in which the Mantras were to be used and explanations of the legends &c. connected with the Mantras [see brāhmaṇa, vidhi], both these portions being termed Sruti, revelation orally communicated by the Deity, and heard but not composed or written down by men [cf. I. W. 24 &c.], although it is certain that both Mantras and Brāhmaṇas were compositions spread over a considerable period, much of the latter being comparatively modern; as the Vedas are properly three, so the Mantras are properly of three forms, 1. Ric, which are verses of praise in metre, and intended for loud recitation; 2. Yajus, which are in prose, and intended for recitation in a lower tone at sacrifices; 3. Sāman, which are in metre, and intended for chanting at the Soma or Moon-plant ceremonies, the Mantras of the fourth or Atharva-veda having no special name; but it must be borne in mind that the Yajur and Sāma-veda hymns, especially the latter, besides their own Mantras, borrow largely from the Rig-veda; the Yajur-veda and Sāma-veda being in fact not so much collections of prayers and hymns as special prayer- and hymn-books intended as manuals for the Adhvaryu and Udgātṛi priests respectively [see yajur-veda, sāma-veda]; the Atharva-veda, on the other hand, is, like the Rig-veda, a real collection of original hymns mixed up with incantations, borrowing little from the Rig and having no direct relation to sacrifices, but supposed by mere recitation to produce long life, to cure diseases, to effect the ruin of enemies &c.; each of the four Vedas seems to have passed through numerous Śākhās or schools, giving rise to various recensions of the text, though the Rig-veda is only preserved in the Śākala recension, while a second recension, that of the Bhāṣkalas, is only known by name; a tradition makes Vyāsa the compiler and arranger of the Vedas in their present form: they each have an Index or Anukramaṇī [q. v.], the principal work of this kind being the general Index or Sarvānukramaṇī [q. v.]; out of the Brāhmaṇa portion of the Veda grew two other departments of Vedic literature, sometimes included under the general name Veda, viz. the strings of aphoristic rules, called Sūtras [q. v.], and the mystical treatises on the nature of God and the relation of soul and matter, called Upanishad [q. v.], which were appended to the *Āraṇyaka*s [q. v.], and became the real Veda of thinking Hindūs, leading to the Darśanas or systems of philosophy; in the later literature the name of 'fifth Veda' is accorded to the Itihāsa or legendary epic poems and to the Purāṇas, and certain secondary Vedas or Upa-vedas [q. v.] are enumerated; the Vedāṅgas or works serving as limbs [for preserving the integrity] of the Veda are explained under vedāṅga below: the only other works included under the head of Veda being the Parīśaḍas, which supply rules for the ritual omitted in the Sūtras; in the Bṛihad-Āraṇyaka Upanishad the Vedas are represented as the breathings of Brahmi, while in some of the Purāṇas the four Vedas are said to have issued out of the four mouths of the four-faced Brahmi and in the Vishnu-Purāṇa the Veda and Vishnu are identified), RTL. 7 &c.; IW. 5; 24 &c.; N. of the num-

शिव śivā, mfn(ā)n. (according to Up. i, 153, fr. 4.1. śi, 'in whom all things lie,' perhaps connected with śivī, cf. śavas, śivā) auspicious, propitious, gracious, favourable, benign, kind, benevolent, friendly, dear (im, ind. kindly, tenderly), RV. &c. &c.; happy, fortunate, BhP.; m. happiness, welfare (cf. n.), K. v, 56, 36; liberation, final emancipation, L.; 'The Auspicious one,' N. of the disintegrating or destroying and reproducing deity who constitutes the third god of the Hindū Trimūrti or Triad, the other two being Brahmā 'the creator' and Viṣṇu 'the preserver'; in the Veda the only N. of the destroying deity was Rudra 'the terrible god', but in later times it became usual to give that god the euphemistic N. Śiva 'the auspicious' (just as the Furies were called Εὐμενίδες 'the gracious ones'), and to assign him the office of creation and reproduction as well as dissolution; in fact the preferential worship of Śiva as developed in the Purāṇas and Epic poems led to his being identified with the Supreme Being by his exclusive worshippers (called Śaivas); in his character of destroyer he is sometimes called Kāla 'black,' and is then also identified with 'Time,' although his active destroying function is then oftener assigned to his wife under her name Kālī, whose formidable character makes her a general object of propitiation by sacrifices; as presiding over reproduction consequent on destruction Śiva's symbol is the Līṅga (q.v.) or Phallus, under which form he is worshipped all over India at the present day; again one of his representations is as Ardha-nārī, 'half-female,' the other half being male to symbolize the unity of the generative principle (RTL. S5); he has three eyes, one of which is in his forehead, and which are thought to denote his view of the three divisions of time, past, present, and future, while a moon's crescent, above the central eye, marks the measure of time by months, a serpent round his neck the measure by years, and a second necklace of skulls with other serpents about his person, the perpetual revolution of ages, and the successive extinction and generation of the races of mankind; his hair is thickly matted together, and gathered above his forehead into a coil; on the top of it he bears the Ganges, the rush of which in its descent from heaven he intercepted by his head that the earth might not be crushed by the weight of the falling stream; his throat is dark-blue from the stain of the deadly poison which would have destroyed the world had it not been swallowed by him on its production at the churning of the ocean by the gods for the nectar of immortality; he holds a tri-śūla or three-pronged trident (also called Pināka) in his hand to denote, as some think, his combination of the three attributes of Creator, Destroyer, and Regenerator; he also carries a kind of drum, shaped like an hour-glass, called Ḍamaru: his attendants or servants are called Pramaṭha (qq. vv.); they are regarded as demons or supernatural beings of different kinds, and form various hosts or troops called Gaṇas; his wife Durgā (otherwise called Kālī, Pārvatī, Umā, Gaurī, Bhāvā &c.) is the chief object of worship with the Śāktas and Tāntrikas, and in this connection he is fond of dancing [see Ḍāṇḍava] and wine-drinking; he is also worshipped as a great ascetic and is said to have scorched the god of love [Kāma-deva] to ashes by a glance from his central eye, that deity having attempted to inflame him with passion for Pārvatī whilst he was engaged in severe penance; in the exercise of his function of Universal Destroyer he is fabled to have burnt up the Universe and all the gods, including Brahmā and Viṣṇu, by a similar scorching glance, and to have rubbed the resulting ashes upon his body, whence the use of ashes in his worship, while the use of the Rudrākṣa berries originated, it is said, from the legend that Śiva, on his way to destroy the three cities, called Tri-pura, let fall some tears of rage which became converted into these beads: his residence or heaven is Kailāsa, one of the loftiest northern peaks of the Himalaya; he has strictly no incarnations like those of Viṣṇu, though Vira-bhadra and the eight Bhairavas and Khaṇḍo-bā &c. [RTL. 266] are sometimes regarded as forms of him; he is especially worshipped at Benares and has even more names than Viṣṇu, one thousand and eight being specified in the 60th chapter of the Śiva-Purāṇa and in the 17th chapter of the Anuśāna-parvan of the Mahā-bhārata, some of the most common being Mahā-deva, Śaṃbhu, Śaṃkara, Īśa, Īśvara, Mahēśvara, Īlāra; his sons are Gaṇeśa and Kārttikeya, Asvṛṣṭ; MBh.; Kāv. &c.; RTL. 73; a kind of second Śiva (with Śaivas), a person who has attained a partic. stage of perfection or emancipation, MBh.; Sarvad.; śiva-līṅga, L.; any god, L.; a euphemistic N. of a jackal (generally śivā, f., q.v.); sacred writings, L.; (in astron.) N. of the sixth month; a post for cows (to which they are tied or for them to rub against), L.; bdellium, L.; the fragrant bark of Feronia Elephantum, L.; Marsilia Dentata, L.; a kind of thorn-apple or = pundarika (the tree), L.; quicksilver, L.
